Jacci Turner is a self-taught writer. She loves to write books that make you think about justice issues like racism, cyber bullying, the suffering of the earth, and what it means to be a family. She has always been a storyteller, charging her neighbors a nickel to see her plays when she was five years old. She is involved in the spiritual community of Reno, writing a book and blog on her spiritual practice. Through her hospice experience, she has used writing to process grief.

Turner has taught elementary, middle school and high school students about character development and plotting and young adults and seniors about writing, marketing, and blogging. She has worked as a school counselor, in leadership development for college students and has taught listening skills to nursing students.

Turner studied Theatre and Social Work at Chico State College in California and obtained a Master's Degree in Marriage and Family Counseling and School Counseling. She feels writing seventeen books and working with editors has been her best training. She continues to attend seminars and classes to help her develop her craft.
